

I am hoping that the FCC will not do anything to dilute the effectiveness of the No Phone law that Indiana has enacted. The quality of experience that I have upon returning home has been greatly enhanced by my number being on the Indiana list. I used to receive at least 3 calls a night and often more and they were usually just as my family was sitting down to eat. We routinely do support many charities and as a rule will not buy anything over the phone period. Therefore this rule being continued will have no negative effect on any company that used to call me. A national rule is probably an excellent idea, but should not dilute or diminish any state rule that is already in effect. Your careful consideration of this in your deliberations is greatly appreciated by a citizenry tired of intrusive and irritating invasion of their home life. Again, thanks.
